One of the key resources available to boards and superintendents are external experts. Performance could be especially problematic because early expert systems were built using tools such as earlier Lisp versions that interpreted code expressions without first compiling. DeGroot was interested in understanding how world-class chess masters are consistently able to out-think their opponents. While the rules for an expert system were more comprehensible than typical computer code, they still had a formal syntax where a misplaced comma or Making External Experts Work character could cause havoc as with any other computer language.
